

How do you know a feeling is yours?

Jonas has a good life in Berlin, and a quiet ache beneath it: he cares, more than he can quite explain, about a world he feels powerless to change at any scale that matters — a mismatch, he tells himself, not a moral failure. Then Iris walks into his days and rearranges them like weather, and for a while it is simply happiness.

But Iris's memories begin to come apart when she looks at them too closely — a childhood, a city, a life that don't quite hold. Together they set out to understand who she really is, and what they find is nothing either of them expected: a turn that changes not only her story but the shape of the world they thought they lived in, and opens, improbably, onto something like a new dawn.

What Rain Feels Like is a love story wrapped around a mystery — a novel about memory, freedom, and being wholly known by someone you cannot fully explain.
